It Is Tulip Planting Season

Everywhere I look there are signs that the season is changing. The once verdant green landscape is now tinged with gold and copper tones. As the daylight hours grow shorter, it is a reminder that now is the time to get bulbs in the ground in order to have an abundant flush of early spring blooms.

To help fellow flower lovers prepare for spring, I put together a little two-part series on fall-planted bulbs. Yesterday's post was all about narcissus (daffodils). Today's focus is on tulips. Read more.

Focusing on Gratitude

Here in the states, we are celebrating Thanksgiving today. A holiday centered around abundance, gratitude, and the celebration of plenty. Traditionally an overflowing table is set, family and friends gather round, and everyone feasts and shares what they are thankful for. In light of recent events, focusing on the positive has been more difficult than usual. I've heard from many of my closest friends that they're having a hard time shaking off fear and uncertainty about the future. But no matter who you voted for, or what you believe is the right way forward, it's important that we extend grace to one another, rather than letting our differences divide us. Read more.

Our Favorite Dahlia Varieties

Dahlias are one of the most beautiful, versatile, and productive cut flowers you can grow. We have been growing dahlias in abundance for 8 years now. Over this time, we have conducted numerous field trials, growing over 400 unique varieties! I've recorded notes and have made comparisons on every single one. My obsession is a little out of control.

All dahlias are beautiful in their own way, but as a flower farmer I've had to measure them a bit more harshly based on specific criteria in order to decide which ones ultimately make the cut here on our farm. It's often a difficult process to let certain varieties go, but with limited growing space, and eager customers always wanting MORE FLOWERS, only the best and most productive varieties have been able to stay.
